National Pet Dental Health Month

February is National Pet Dental Health Month, so our spotlight for February is “Dental Health”. Common indications of oral disease include bad breath, a change in eating or chewing habits, pawing at the face or mouth, and depression.

According to the American Veterinary Dental Society, an astounding 80 percent of dogs and 70 percent of cats show signs of oral disease by age 3. Oral disease is the single most frequently diagnosed health problem for our furry companions.

Dog breath is nothing to smile about ...

... even for a cat.

Bacteria combines with food debris and saliva to cause plaque formations that accumulate on the tooth. As bacteria grow and calcium salts are deposited, plaque turns to tartar. Tartar enhances bacterial attachment to further plaque development, which can irritate gingival (gum) tissues and eventually lead to periodontal disease.

The first step to prevent oral disease is a routine physical exam with a look at those choppers. Pet parents should practice a regular dental hygiene regimen at home, which may include brushing their teeth with a pet specific toothpaste (don't use human varieties) or using other options such as food additives, water additives, chewable dental bones, or raw bones.

8 Tips for a Healthier Pet

These tips come directly from Dr. Karen Becker, DVM, founder of Mercola's Healthy Pets (which is a favorite resource for science based pet health information).

#1 – Feed Fresh. The goal is to feed your pet a diet that helps them to thrive. If you can't feed fresh every meal, even small steps like fresh snacks can really help.

#2 – Exercise with your pet. Your furry friend can help you keep that New Year's resolution of getting back in shape, simply by taking a few more walks.

#3 – Replace that retractable leash. While they may give your pet more freedom, the main purpose of a leash is to keep your pet safe and under your control. Retractable leashes often do the exact opposite.

#4 – Crate train your pet. Most people assume crate training is just for dogs, but it's just as beneficial for cats.

#5 – Refuse unnecessary vaccinations. She isn't recommending becoming an “anti-vaxxer”. She is referring to recognizing the difference between too many vaccinations and protective ones. Be informed. It's ok to question your vet.

#6 – Do your homework before adopting. It's a lifelong commitment. Evaluate both your readiness and ability to be a good pet parent and learn the disposition of your potential breed or rescue companion to be sure they will fit your lifestyle.

#7 – Learn about predisposed genetic diseases. There are steps you can take to prevent your pet from acquiring those diseases, and there are ways to treat or effectively manage those that do occur.

#8 – Provide ongoing training and socialization. Well socialized pets make great companions but providing daily opportunities to interact with new people and places is the key.
